In Max Barry's novel, Jennifer Government, the characters take their employers' marks as their surname: her imaginary world is populated by characters such as John Nike and Hayley McDonaldâ's. Satire stings because we're so used to the pervasiveness of big business. They have been so entrenched for so long that they seem an inevitable part of the way the world works. But the emerging reality is something very different. Look at what has happened in the banking industry, once the undisputed dominance of giants like Citibank. Now, London-based Zopa is using the Internet to allow borrowers and lenders to connect and agree directly on loans. Bob needs the dollars to self-publish a book; Bill wants the money for home improvement. Make the loan! Consultant Patricia Seybold calls it "the eBay of banking". Well, bankers, join the club. "Like it or not, the traditional definition of business has been questioned." It was Virginia "Ginni" Rometty, who runs IBM's global consulting and services business, speaking at the company's Global Innovation Outlook Summit last spring. The summit itself is proof of this: IBM used to do all its business and technology planning and forecasting entirely on its own. He now invites clients to join with the smartest people he knows in government, nonprofit and academia. And it makes the results public through conferences and reports. Rometty lived through all sorts of organizational theory: vertical, horizontal, matrix, and now globally integrated. "But one way or another, it's about hierarchy and rules, and they exist within monolithic enterprises", he said. "So I want to test you on this: is [the future] a world of a billion individual businesses, where you organize around a business, to do something, instead of organizing around your company? Think of the old pillars of corporate power: once only big companies could afford to own a computer. Only large companies could organise a large number of people and allow them to work together effectively. Only large companies could carry out advanced scientific research and technological development. Only large companies could advertise to the mass market of consumers. And only large companies had the capital to build and operate production facilities. All this is transformed by the democratizing force of a It was digital that makes it easy for people, scattered and different, gather and communicate effectively even if they are not linked by any formal organization. Science is already becoming the pursuit of a large number of individuals from all over the planet that collaborate in in time on the Internet. As far as the expensive manufacturing work is concerned, nanotechnology promises to make it considerably cheaper. Instead of ordering a computer monitor from the DellâÅ!s factory, you will buy a can of nano-ink at Office Depot, then use the laser printer to print the ink on a sheet of paper or floppy plastic, forming all the circuits of the monitor itself. The nano-ink will be produced in a chemistry lab that costs about $100,000 to build it. This dynamic is transforming the way almost all large organizations in every sector behave. We expect Google to do something creative like openly experimenting with new ideas through its Google Labs site, where it recently allowed people to try out a taxi finder in real time. The really interesting thing is to see Fidelity Investments, the venerable mutual fund company, come into play. His Fidelity Labs site features public experiments with a financial-oriented search engine, free checks and a "savings-search rate". Your contributions are welcome! The real point is not that big companies are leaving. Many will survive, but they will have to reinvent themselves to participate fully in this new interconnected, interconnected and decentralised world. Procter & Gamble recently sent 70 "tech entrepreneurs" around the world looking for ideas "not invented here". It found that for each of its 7,500 in-house scientists, there are another 200 around the world, about 1.5 million in total, who are just as advanced. Ideas flowing in the opposite direction can also have a disruptive power: Caterpillar, the old heavy equipment manufacturer, is now considered an "intellectual property company." It began aggressively granting its copyrights and 7,000 patents to unlock its value. The more a company opens up to the outside world, the better its chances are. In this new era, scale will not guarantee profitability in the face of highly interconnected customers, suppliers and competitors. But all those scientists and employees can do amazing things if they connect with what's happening outside your walls. John Nike won't know what hit him. Comments from Fast Company Connection, a panel reading Hierarchy of Control Values. Control can make us feel more comfortable, but it's not as effective as getting the buy-in. The hierarchy values exclusive knowledge makes us feel important, but real value comes from being known as a good source of knowledge. The hierarchy is just a structure, which works best when it deviates from its values. Madelyn Blair Jefferson, Maryland Pellerei Inc. The concept of virtual business is not particularly new. What has changed is the ability of people from different companies to connect efficiently to take advantage of the virtual scale. John Lloyd San Diego, California Qualcomm The global corporate elite doesn't really need to "reinvent themselves" in this "new interconnected, interconnected, decentralized world". New technologies, new ways of thinking and organic networks are acquired by someone when they are considered fiscally sustainable.
