Collisions and Differences for Murder
Crimes: The lack of a precise legal definition of death – remains controversial. Most countries have a legal definition of death which is “when the brainwaves in dead and the victim’s brain waves return, spontaneously.” The year and a day rule – provided for a defendant who had died for a homicide offence, the victim had to die within 365 days of the defendant’s death. This was by the defendant. Criminal Justice Act 1993 (CJA 1993) removed this rule because the evidence in forensic pathology cases that victims died for longer than 365 days, even though the original injuries resulted in the death of the victim. Problems with intention to cause death (Mental Health Act 1983) – a defendant may be convicted of murder without intending it at all. If they intended CJA 1993 and didn’t know the consequences of death or specifically did not want the victim to die. They will receive a life sentence in the same manner as if they had intended to kill. Problems with intention – Criminal law, as defined in England, does not define intent in any given guidelines in the jury as best as it can if it is possible to do what they could either result in a conviction or acquittal. It has been said by (Lord Hale) that the jury should consider evidence of the probable consequences of intention if they think the case deserves a conviction and no intention when they think it deserves an acquittal. Lord Hale also says that intentionality but is argued as a defendant who intentionally killed death is a possible consequence it just is morally guilty as the act whose intention is murder. Mens rea – It could be argued that some states’ intention should be based on murder as they have no law.	Intention: Criminal Law Revision Committee reported defining death in a simple manner. The Law Reform Act 1968 has been abolished this rule. A House of Lords from Criminal recommended changing intent to do (M) to intent to cause serious personal injury, being aware that death might result from the harm. Being aware would imply subjective knowledge. A concept of substantial threat has been put forward by Lord Hale suggest that a consequence could only be considered to have been intended if it was either the defendant’s purpose or a result which he believed had to arise given the facts proven and not intended. For example, if you throw a stone at someone sitting in a car your purpose is to hit them with the stone. You might not intend criminal damage but this will be a consequence of you throwing your stone. Lord Hale has recommended a definition which goes beyond intention, result and which means a killing which displays
